Delawareans Get Free Day to Visit the First State's Tourism Attractions

"Free to the First State" Celebrates National Tourism Week

Dover (May 7, 2007) – Visitor attractions in Delaware will open their doors, free of charge to state residents, on Saturday, May 19, 2007, when the popular "Free to the First State" program returns to celebrate National Tourism Week.

The 24th Annual National Tourism Week, scheduled May 12-20, 2007, is commemorated by states, cities and organizations across the nation. "Free to the First State" encourages residents to explore the museums, state parks and other visitor attractions in their own state every year in Delaware. This year, 48 attractions are participating in the program – a record since it began in 1999.

"Delaware offers so many attractions and family fun events for all of our residents and visitors to enjoy that I encourage everyone to take advantage of this special opportunity," said Governor Ruth Ann Minner. "This is truly a special day for all Delawareans to experience the spectacular sights and venues that make the First State a great place to live and visit."

For free admission to the participating tourism attractions, Delaware residents only need to show proof of residency, such as a driver's license, student ID or a military ID. Fees for tours or special exhibits may apply at some attractions.

"On Saturday, May 19, residents will be offered a fun and free opportunity to check out what attracts more than 8 million visitors to our state each year," said Director of the Delaware Tourism Office Tim Morgan. "'Free to the First State' is an excellent opportunity for our residents to discover our state's many inherent natural treasures, outdoor activities and outstanding attractions."

The "Free to the First State" campaign is sponsored by the Delaware Tourism Office, the Greater Wilmington Convention and Visitors Bureau, the Kent County Convention and
